

Harlequin and Columbine

[...]bellowing on high. Lower that strip! You dont want that strip lowered, I tell you! Oh, my Lord! Cant you lower that strip! Another workman at the rear of the stage began to saw a plank, and somebody else, concealed behind a bit of scenery, hammered terrifically upon metal. Altogether it was a successful outbreak. Potter threw his manuscript upon the table, a gesture that caused the shoulders of Packer to move in a visible shudder, and the company, all eyes fixed upon the face of the star, suddenly wore the look of people watching a mysterious sealed packet from which a muffled ticking is heard. The bellowing and the sawing and the hammering increased in fury. In the orchestra a rusty gleam of something like mummified pleasure passed unseen behind the spectacles of old Carson Tinker. Stage-hands are the devil, he explained to the stupefied Canby. Rehearsals bore them and they love to[...].
