

Manners and Rules of Good Society

[...]dinner-parties. A hostess should, in some instances, introduce ladies to each other in the drawing-room after dinner if the opportunity offers, and she considers it advisable to do so. As a rule, a host seldom introduces gentlemen to each other in the dining-room after dinner, as they address each other as a matter of course on such occasions. A hostess should introduce her principal guests to each other, at five-o'clock teas, garden-parties, small at homes, etc. that is to say, gentlemen to ladies for the purpose of their taking the ladies to the tea-room. In this case also, the introduction should be made without previously consulting the lady; and a gentleman, knowing the reason of the introduction, should at once proffer the expected civility. At these gatherings a hostess should use her own discretion as to any general introductions she thinks proper to make, and should introduce[...].
