Not illustrated. 1823 Excerpt: ...distance from them a bird of uncommon size, endeavouring to make its escape by flight, which, from some hurt, it seemed unable to effect; the women speedily overtook their game, when a desperate conflict ensued, and it was not until it had been killed by the prongs with which they were armed, that the object of their pursuit could be secured. 11 proved to be the Peticanus bassanus of Linnsus, the Gannet, or Solan goose, a bird rarely met with upon our coast; though very common in the Hebrides, and the rocky isles of North Britain. The French Press--TriBunal Op Correctional PoLice.--The Cause of the Miroir--M. Michelot, the editor of the Miroir, was accused of having, by two articles published therein on the 17th and 28th of August, insulted the person of the king, and outraged the religion of the state. The first of these articles was intituled, Paris in 5839; a Dream. In it the author supposes that America is become the centre of civilization, and that Europe is only one vast solitude covered with ruins. He crosses the ocean to visit these remains, the sad evidences of departed greatness, and, following the course of the Seine, arrives at the ruins of Paris. The author then proceeds,-- Here, at every turning, the most learned antiquarian of our party favoured us with a profound dissertation. Behold, he exclaimed, the site of a magnificent edifice, which was called the Palais Royal, because it was the residence of the monarch. Here you may see what was once the Louvre. The origin of this name is unknown, but by analogy, I am induced to affirm, that Louvre was only the translation of the Latin word lupania--Utuverie, a place for wolves. The Louvre, therefore, was the abode of wild beasts, which the kings kept
