

The Girl from Farriss

JUST what Mr. Doarty was doing in the alley back of Farriss at two of a chill spring morning would have puzzled those citizens of Chicago who knew Mr. Doarty best. To a casual observer it might have appeared that Mr. Doarty was doing nothing more remarkable than leaning against a telephone pole, which in itself might have been easily explained had Mr. Doarty not been so palpably sober; but there are no casual observers in the South Side levee at two in the morning--those who are in any condition to observe at all have the eyes of ferrets. This was not the first of Mr. Doarty's nocturnal visits to the vicinage of Farriss. For almost a week he had haunted the neighborhood between midnight and dawn, for Mr. Doarty had determined to get Mr. Farris. From the open doors of a corner saloon came bursts of bacchanal revelry--snatches of ribald song; hoarse laughter; the hysterical scream of a woman; but though this place, too, was Farriss and the closing hour long passed Mr. Doarty deigned not to notice so minor an infraction of the law. Hadnt Lieutenant Barnut filed some ninety odd complaints against the saloon-keeper-alderman of the Eighteenth Ward for violation of this same ordinance, only to have them all pigeonholed in the city prosecutors office? Hadnt he appeared in person before the September Grand Jury, and hadnt the state Attorneys office succeeded in bamboozling that August body into the belief that they had nothing whatsoever to do with the matter? An anyhow, what was an aldermanic drag compared with that possessed by Abe Farris? No; Mr. Doarty, had you questioned him, would have assured you that he had not been born so recently as yesterday; that he was entirely dry behind the ears; and that if he got Mr. Farris at all he would get him good and plenty, for had he not only a week before, learning that Mr. Doarty was no longer in the good graces of his commanding officer, refused to acknowledge Mr. Doartys right to certain little incidental emoluments upon which time-honored custom had placed the seal of lawful title?
