

Excerpt from The Works of Alexander Hamilton, Vol. 2: Containing His Correspondence, and His Political and Official Writings, Exclusive of the Federalist, Civil and Military
The honorable member who spoke yesterday went into an explanation of a variety of circumstances to prove the expediency of a change in our National Government, and the necessity of a firm Union; at the same time he described the great advantages which this State, in particular, receives from the Confederacy, and its peculiar weaknesses when abstracted from the Union. In doing this he advanced a variety of arguments which deserve serious consideration. Gentlemen have this day come forward to answer him. He has been treated as having wandered in the flowery fields of fancy, and at tempts have been made to take off from the minds of the committee that sober impression which might be expected from his arguments.
