

Veronese in London (Studies in World Art Book 87)

The magnificent Veronese show that has just opened at the National Gallery in London has met with a curiously subdued response from local reviewers. They recognize that it is a magnificent event of its kind, and one that is especially appropriate because the gallery has an important group of works by this 16th century Venetian painter in its own collection, among them they famous Family of Darius before Alexander. The show is extremely well presented in the upstairs galleries of the main building, not in the subterranean spaces of the modern annex one good reason for this being that a number of the paintings, among them the huge altarpiece of the Martyrdom of Saint George, from San Giorgio in Braida, Verona, are simply too big to fit into the NGs dedicated temporary exhibition space.
